Reginald Rose

Reginald Rose: born December 10, 1920 – died April 19, 2002

- He was an American film and television writer most widely known for his work in the early years of television drama.
- Rose is known for writing about controversial social and political issues. His realistic approach helped create the genre of television drama of the 1950's.

Twelve Angry Men

- Was originally written for television by Reginald Rose.

Reginald originally got the idea to write the show after he served on the jury of a manslaughter case in New York City.

He had been reluctant to do jury duty but changed his mind when he realized the importance of his role in determining the fate of another human being. This experience was the inspiration for the play. Some of the events that take place in the story actually happened.

- The play, written by Sherman Sergel, is an adaptation of the television production.

The 1950's

Historical Context

- 1950's
 - A socially conservative time.
 - People were very materialistic. The American Dream had turned into the dream of owning things.
 - Juvenile delinquency was said to be at an all-time high.
 - African Americans were subject to racial discrimination.
 - Comics were published and growing in popularity.
 - Television sales were booming.
 - A new age group – “teenagers”

The major ideas of the play

- Discrimination – to either find the difference between two things or to treat someone unfairly because they are different from you eg. gender, ethnic origin
- Justice – what is right or fair
- Integrity – adhering to a code of values
